The Dichotomy Free and Literal Translation

Peter Newmark's view on literal translation is deeply rooted in traditional debates on the two basic translation methods, literal vs. free translation. Such debates have quite a long history both in the West and in China.

Literal translation/ word-for-word translation (or "formal correspondence") means the translation aims to have as close as possible word-for-word correspondence between original source language of translation to the target language. This approach (when pursued in earnest) is often in contrast to semantic or free translation although in some cases, may produce less natural awkward phrases.

What is the difference among free translation, semantic
